Life:

Dubuque.
The Peoples Store was robbed Monday night, two suits of clothes and two overcoats being the booty secured by the marauders. The cash register was pried open but there were only a few pennies in it. Two suspects, LeRoy Berkley and Harry Blewett, Dubuquers, are being held by the police as the robber suspects.

BOB NANDELL/THE REGISTER

Veteran meter checkers Elizabeth Triggs, left, and Janet Nutt show off one of their squad's five new cars. Triggs has been a checker for 29 years and Nutt for 24 years.

Meter readers write ticket to pleasant job

This is downtown Workers Appreciation Week, and even workers one would think are underappreciated feel appreciated.

Meter maids love their jobs.

They've gained respect since becoming part of the police department a year ago. They have more power. They carry police radios and can impound cars. Their uniforms are crisp, new and uniform. They don't even have to wear the little hats.

And people thank them for parking tickets.

"You probably get more thank-yous for a ticket than you get chewed out," said Jan Burham. She's been a meter checker — that's the official term now — for 21 years.

"Back when I applied for it, nobody wanted it," she said. Only one other person applied for her job. "I didn't realize — until I took the job — that maybe people wouldn't be happy with me," Burham said.

Every meter checker — the

Mary Ann LICKTEIG

investment officer Rhett Fritz likes them because they get after those people who block traffic during rush hour.

The city general fund likes them because they brought in $429,687 in parking ticket revenue last fiscal year. The 3,153 meters collected $968,867.33.

Human

And the checkers are human.

Burham saw a car parked in a no-parking zone in front of a building Wednesday. The driver probably just ran in, she said. Since traffic wasn't heavy, she'd give him a few minutes to move. He didn't.

When she pulled up to write a ticket, she noticed the car's registration was expired, too. But before she wrote the tickets, the driver came out.

He'd been warned the day before about the expired registration stickers, he said. "I won't park here again; I swear," he told Burham.

And she let him go.

He was honest, she said. "Honesty is always the best policy because we've heard all of the excuses."

A woman who got to her car just after Burham, took her ticket and dropped more coins into the meter without saying a word.

"It's really a pretty good job anymore," Burham said.

city has seven — runs into rude, irrational people, but they don't dwell on those.

Dead Man

Elizabeth Triggs found a dead man once. She thought he looked suspicious, so she swung by his car a second time, then called police.

Several checkers found the German shepherd. It was alive. A driver left the dog in his car — for the checkers, the checkers presume.

"Remember the Doberman?" Burham asked.

And her co-workers answered like a church chorus: "Yes." The Doberman was black and the interior of the car was black so the checkers wouldn't realize the dog was there until they saw its teeth.

People appreciate the fact that meter checkers are doing their job, the checkers said. Downtown

Unappreciated

Other downtown workers said they could tolerate a little more appreciation.

A data entry clerk at Bankers Trust Co. said she doesn't appreciate not being able to sit on the outside ledge to smoke. Standing and smoking is allowed, she said, but not sitting and smoking.

"Because it's their granite or whatever," said the worker, whose request to remain anonymous suggests a job where one goes unappreciated is better than no job at all.

Down the street, Caroline Pottebaum sipped juice during her break Wednesday afternoon. She is a 59-year-old corporate file clerk at Norwest Bank. Does she feel appreciated?

"Never thought about," Pottebaum said. "I'm just tickled to death I got a job."
