Plays Role of Heroine

Homeward or holiday bound, a crowd of more than 50 persons were injured—at least two of them seriously—Saturday night when a Provo Salt Lake & Utah Railroad company train crashed into the rear of a stalled Magna train, property of the same line.

The collision occurred at 6:45 p. m. at the Pike station, three miles south of Salt Lake City. Cars of both electrically driven trains were damaged badly.

Exact cause of the wreck was undetermined. H. C. Webster, line superintendent, refused to comment until his company's investigation has been completed.

27 Returned to S. L.

Twenty-seven of the injured were returned to Salt Lake City aboard one of the damaged cars and were admitted to the Holy Cross hospital for treatment.

M. Frisby, Riverton.

The above group received first aid treatment at the local depot and was permitted to either take special trains to their destinations or to remain in Salt Lake City.

Six Doctors Work

A corps of six doctors and 15 nurses, pressed into emergency duty, worked five hours over the injured ly, then the brakes either laxed or were rendered useless on the rain-dampened tracks, and the rushing car rammed into the stalled carrier with terrific force.

The crash bowled passengers into the aisles, hurled them against the backrests of the seats ahead and into the car walls. Glass shattered and frame portions of the cars splintered.

Paul Winn, motorman of the Magna car, was unable to lessen the impact, his car being unable to move under its own power.

The passenger compartments of both trains were loaded, and some of the men passengers were riding in the front baggage section which houses the motormen. All were hurled to the floor by the force of the impact.

An 18-year-old Magna high school girl, Miss Clarissa Rasmussen, although badly injured, took command of the situation and ordered first aid treatments for the most seriously injured. She directed uninjured passengers to open the train's first aid kit and then instructed them in the treatments.

The passengers either were going to their southern Utah homes or were riding the Orem for a weekend holiday to some southern point.

Disorder Reigns

A scene of wild disorder followed the crash. Wounds, gashed by splintered glass, soon smeared the interiors of both cars with streaks of crimson. Women fainted. Many of the passengers were rendered unconscious, and others were dazed for many minutes.

worked five hours over the injured before diagnoses had been completed.

After receiving first aid treatment for minor injuries and shock, the other passengers were entrained on special trains for their destinations.

Frank M. Orem, comptroller for the railroad company, directed the emergency work, sending the most painfully injured passengers to the Holy Cross hospital in a chartered bus. Those seriously hurt were sent to the hospital in an ambulance.

Seventeen injured remained in the hospital overnight to receive examination and treatment for their injuries.

Ten were discharged after preliminary treatment.

According to schedule, the Provo-bound trolley left for the south; 15 minutes later, the car which carried 60-odd passengers came upon the stalled Magna car.

A. A. Ahrens, motorman, applied his brakes. The train lurched sharp-for many minutes.

Their knees and shins suffered most, being shoved against the seats forward. Many suffered painful nose, facial and head injuries as they were knocked from their seats. Those standing fell headlong.

Men passengers, standing in the baggage compartment, said they saw the impending crash was inevitable when the brakes failed to hold, and that they braced themselves for the shock.

These witnesses said that Motorman Ahrens apparently was powerless to act further after he had applied his brakes.

Whether Ahrens or Winn were injured was not learned. C. C. Green, conductor of the Provo line, suffered chest injuries, but he was not hospitalized.

A "dice" snake, 52 inches long and believed to have been shipped from France, attacked M. R. Gibben, surveyor of Deal, England, in his garden and was killed by him.

Probe Blames Rail Crash on Boys' Prank

Oil Residue Found on Tracks, Official Says; Five Still in Hospital

Oil on the rails, believed to have been spread by mischievous boys, was held responsible Sunday for the injury of more than 50 persons Saturday night in a collision between two Salt Lake & Utah railroad trains at Pike station, three miles south of Salt Lake City.

Railroad officials and a representative of the state public utilities commission investigating the accident in an all-day Sunday session at the interurban depot, found evidence pointing to the presence of oil on the tracks. Company investigators declared the oil apparently been stolen from journal boxes of cars standing on a sidetrack near Pike station.

"Oil on the tracks undoubtedly prevented the brakes of the Provo-bound train from working," said Frank M. Orem, comptroller for the railroad. "They were applied when the oncoming train was 1200 feet away from the halted train. The wheels slid when unable to obtain traction, but speed had been reduced to no more than eight miles an hour when the moving train struck the stationary one."

stationary one.

Ten Released

As investigators inquired into the cause of the collision, 10 of the 15 accident victims held in Holy Cross hospital for treatment were released as needing no further institutional attention. Those remaining were James S. Fish of Provo, Mrs. Marjorie Hewitt of Ogden and Orin Zimmerman, Clyde Speer and Jack Wignall, all of Salt Lake City.

According to hospital authorities, all the remaining patients will recover. Mr. Fish, the most seriously injured, was said to be in a favorable condition, with chances excellent for his complete recovery.

Twenty-five of the injured passengers were taken to Holy Cross hospital for treatment. All but 15 were discharged Saturday night when their injuries were found not to be serious enough to warrant retention in the hospital. Seventeen were given first aid treatment at the scene of the wreck and taken to their destinations.

Mr. Orem, in a statement issued on behalf of the railroad company, said that evidence adduced from Curtis Green of Murray, conductor of the moving train, and others, showed the train to be traveling at approximately eight miles an hour when it collided with the halted train in charge of Paul Winn of Salt Lake City.

Windows Broken

"The condition of the two cars and the fact that injuries sustained by passengers were not more serious shows that the train in charge of Mr. Green could not have been moving at a high rate of speed," said Mr. Orem. "Cars were not damaged beyond broken windows. Injuries were largely confined to shin and knee hurts and cuts from flying glass."

According to Mr. Orem, considerable trouble has been experienced lately from the actions of careless boys playing along the railroad right-of-way. He told of incidents where boys have turned signal lights, placed rocks on the tracks and chiseled copper from rail bonds. "We have bent every effort to stop these practices," declared the railroad official. "Some of them are extremely dangerous to the youths. All should be stopped, but it is difficult to apprehend the boys who are violating the law in playing on rights-of-way."

Investigators found, they reported, that there was a clear vision ahead for a mile, and that the brakes and reverse gear on the moving train had been applied when 1200 feet away from the halted train.

Oil Evidence

"The train slid like a sled on the apparently oil-spotted rails," said Mr. Orem. "There is some dispute as to the rails being wet, but undoubted evidence of oil being found was adduced during the investigation."

The southbound train ahead of the Provo-bound train had been halted for Conductor Winn to replace a trolley. Under ordinary circumstances, railroad officials declared, it would have been possible for the oncoming train to be stopped by braking long before it reached the readily seen stalled train.

Those taking part in the investigation in addition to Mr. Orem and Mr. Slaughter were H. C. Webster, railroad superintendent; Murray Sullivan, general manager; H. J. Blake, engineer of maintenance of way; William Crawford, chief dispatcher, and C. W. Silver, electrical engineer.

Mr. Orem said that the accident was the first in 18 years on the Salt Lake & Utah railroad in which any person had suffered serious injuries. He declared the company officials had done all in their power to aid the injured passengers and expressed satisfaction in the news that those injured were well on the road to recovery.

PROBE OF RAIL WRECK CLOSED

Five of 50 Hurt Still in Hospital

With five persons awaiting discharge Monday from the Holy Cross hospital and approximately 45 others recovering at their homes, officials of the Salt Lake & Utah railroad closed their probe into a two-train crash Saturday near the Salt Lake City limits.

Only five of the 25 injured passengers taken to Holy Cross hospital after a southbound car, unable to stop on oil-spotted rails, struck a car stalled because its trolley had flipped from an electric line, are still in the hospital. All were reported in fairly good or good condition. They are:

Mrs. Marjorie Hewitt, Ogden, bruises and muscular soreness.

Orin Zimmerman, Salt Lake City, bruises and muscular soreness.

Clyde Speer, Salt Lake City, laceration over right eye.

Jack Wignall, Salt Lake City, fractured right wrist.

Frank M. Orem, comptroller for the railroad, blamed the crash on boys who spread oil on the rails, making it impossible for the car loaded with 50 passengers to stop.

Railroad and state public utilities officials investigating the crash said they found unmistakable evidence that oil, apparently stolen from journal boxes of cars standing on a sidetrack near the Pike station, three and one-half miles south of the Interurban depot, had been spread on the rails.

Wheels Stalled

"The stalled car was in plain view of the oncoming car for nearly a mile," Mr. Orem said. "Brakes were applied when the oncoming train was 1200 feet away from the halted train, which was ample space in which to stop. But the wheels slid on the oil. Speed had been reduced, however, to no more than eight miles per hour when the crash occurred.

"Had the train been moving at high speed, dead and seriously injured passengers would have been strewn all over the area.

Experienced Motormen

"Two of our most experienced motormen were running the trains."

They were Paul Winn of Salt Lake City, on the stalled car, and A. A. Ahrens, Salt Lake City, on the moving train.

Mr. Winn had dismounted from the halted Magna-bound train to replace a trolley which had slipped off the electric power line, stalling the car motor. The other car was en route to Provo.

Most of the injured suffered bruises on their heads and shins when they were hurled against seat backs or into aisles. The majority of the injured were given first aid treatment at the scene and resumed their journeys. The remainder were taken to Holy Cross hospital for observation.

Boys Suspected

Mr. Orem reported "his line has experienced considerable difficulty from actions of careless boys playing along the right of way. He related incidents of boys having turned signal lights, placed rocks on the tracks and chiseled copper from rail bonds.

"Some of these practices are extremely dangerous," he said, "and we have bent every effort to stop them. Catching the culprits is next to impossible."

Investigators said had the rails

been in good condition,

free of oil, the Provo-bound train would have had ample time in which to stop.

Those taking part in the investigation, in addition to Mr. Orem, were Robert N. Slaughter, inspector for the state public service commission; H. C. Webster, railroad superintendent; Murray Sullivan, general manager; H. J. Blake, engineer of maintenance of way; William Crawford, chief dispatcher, and C. W. Silver, electrical engineer.

Mr. Orem said the accident was the first in 18 years on the Salt Lake & Utah railroad in which any person had suffered serious injuries.
